140   HORACE WALPOLE

of human nature, has shown me some verses; but alas! how came such charming poetry to be thrown away on so unmeritorious a topic? I don't know whether I ought to praise the lines most or censure the object most. Voltaire makes the excellence of French poetry consist in the number of difficulties it vanquishes. Pope, who celebrated Lord Bolingbroke, could not have succeeded, did not succeed, better; and yet I hope that, though a meaner subject, I am not so bad a one! Well! with all my humility, I cannot but be greatly flattered. Madame de Sévigné spread her leaf gold over all her acquaintance and made them shine; I should not doubt of the same glory when Lady Nuneham's poetry shall come to light, if my own works were but burnt at the same time; but alas! Coulanges's verses were preserved, and so may my writings, too. Apropos, my lord, I have got a new volume of that divine woman's letters. Two are entertaining; the rest not very divine. But there is an application, the happiest, the most exquisite that even she herself ever made! She is joking with a Président de Provence, who was hurt at becoming a grandfather. She assures him there is no such great misfortune in it; 'I have experienced the case,' says she, 'and, believe me, pæte, non dolet.' If you are not both transported with this, ye are not the Lord and Lady Nuneham I take ye to be.
